Excerpt: . . . shining virtue repelled their power, and dimmed the glory of their arms. It was no evidence of commendable valor on the part of Andr this undertaking of a mission which he believed to be an easy task. Andr, who had known before her marriage the wife of General Arnold in Philadelphia--in which city, at the time, Andr was a leader in society--entered into correspondence with Arnold and was the agent through whom Arnold bargained, for the price of 6, 000 and a commission in the British Army, not only to surrender West Point, but also to turn over to the enemy the person of Gen. Washington, of Gen. LaFayette and all other American Generals he could persuade to be his guests in the Robinson house, his quarters, on the night of September 26, when the British, it was arranged, would make the attack. Gen. Washington...
