It is many-sided, and when carried out conscientiously plays a useful part, whether in town or country. From the most ancient times public rest-houses and hostelries have been an integral part of the daily life of the nation. Centvuu-ies ago these were oft times under the wing of some great monastery, the most frequent goal of the traveller. In modern times it has been regarded as essential to the business prosperity of any town to be possessed of good hotels and restaurants, for these are admitted conveniences to civilised life in any community. Most certainly to-day, with our many activities, our constant goings and comings, we cannot do without them. It is a curious fact that in Great Britain the social and commercial revolution brought about by the coming of railways reacted detrimentally against catering in our midst. Railways withdrew traffic from the highways, diverted the stream of travellers to new channels, and shortened the stay of guests in hostelries. Consequently the old inns - with their many bedrooms and their great stables for posting business, largely deserted by man and beast - suffered terribly, and many fell into decay. The old coffee-houses and better class eating-houses, too, felt the effects of Times changing hand, though this was due in some substantial measure to clubs springing up and taking their place. It was not, perhaps, to be...
