Excerpt: . about the streets, which was the duty assigned to me. We know a good deal about him now. We cannot fail, and soon we shall be able to fix a day. Vania is the first to . . . March 29. Andrei Petrovich is here. He is a member of the Central Committee, and has to his credit long years of hard labour in the mines and of exile in Siberia; he has lived the life of an old revolutionary. He has melancholy eyes and a pointed grey beard. We went together to a restaurant. You know, George, he began in an embarrassed manner, there is some talk of suspending the work for some time. What do you think of it? Waiter, I called out, put on The Bells of Corneville on the gramophone. Andrei Petrovich lowered his eyes. You won't listen to me, he said, yet it's a very grave matter. How can our present tactics be reconciled with parliamentary work? We must take a definite and consistent stand. One thing or another. We must either adopt constitutional principles and try to get into Parliament, or frankly set up opposition, and then, of course . . . Well, what do you think? What do I think? Nothing. But, please, do make up your mind. Things may come to the point of dismissing you--I mean your organisation. What? I asked rather sharply. To dismiss is not the right word, but--well,...
